What are Cookies

Cookies are small information files that a website stores on a user's computer (usually in browsers such us Chrome, Opera, Mozilla, Firefox, Edge, etc.) so that each time the user visits the website, the latter retrieves such information and offers to the user services relevant to such information.

A typical example of such information is the preferences of the users in a website, as these are stated by the user's choices on that site (such as selecting specific "buttons", searches, advertisements etc.).

General classification information for Cookies

There are two cookies' general categories:

- Technical cookies: Essential for a site to run properly and for a user to navigate. Without such cookies, users may not be able to properly view the pages or use certain services.

- Profiling Cookies: Used to create a user profile in order to send promotional messages according to the preferences displayed by the user while browsing.

Cookies, either «technical» or «profiling», can also be classified as:

- "proprietary" cookies, which are created and managed directly by the operator of the site on which the user is browsing,

- "third party" cookies, which are created and managed by parties other than the operator of the site on which the user is browsing.
